ABSTRACT

Computer mediated communication is becoming increasingly prevalent, with innovations being introduced in rapid succession. One of the more recent ones is video game live streaming, which has seen a huge spike in popularity over the last few years, but is still scarcely researched. This paper placed a streaming platform, Twitch.tv, into the fields of research on computer mediated communication and community building, and argues for Twitch.tv's capabilities as a platform where advanced social networks can emerge, as well as Twitch.tv having developed its own norms regarding the use of language. It approached this medium through the scope of social networking theory, and sought to test whether the distribution of Twitch.tv standard features can be predicted on the basis of network density. We have compiled small quantitative corpora and analyzed the frequency with which linguistic features specific to Twitch.tv were used in networks of varying densities. The results confirmed the notion of network density influencing the distribution of Twitch.tv standard linguistic features, as the frequency with which these features were used increased as the networks got looser.

INTRODUCTION

Over the course of the last two decades, computer mediated communication (CMC) has become more and more prevalent, and with it, academic research in the field has seen increasing interest. New forms of and innovations pertaining to CMC are introduced in rapid succession. One of the more recent ones is video game livestreaming, which has seen an enormous increase in popularity over the past few years, but due to the recent nature of the phenomenon it is still scarcely researched (Hamilton, Garretson & Kerne 2014; Olejniczak 2015). Moreover, it exhibits some interesting attributes pertaining to communication and language that make it unique in its own regard: it is a multimodal, synchronous form of communication in which "viewer participation and community building gain emphasis" (Hamilton et al. 2014: 1315). Twitch.tv is the most popular website that houses such video game livestreams. It averages around 1.5 million unique visitors per day (Quantcast 2015), subdivided into livestreams of various sizes (some of the most popular streamers can reach up to 50,000 concurrent viewers, and tournament broadcast streams (comparable to a sports game) can reach over a million). According to Hamilton et al. (2014: 1316), "stream communities form around a shared identity" and as such, they exhibit linguistic features specific to the streaming community. Olejniczak (2015: 332-333) has shown three features to be central to the general language use on Twitch.tv: the repetition principle, Twitch.tv emoticons and neologisms. Moreover, his research shows that the distribution of these features varies per community. There is, to date, no clear answer as to how or why these features are distributed differently.

This thesis will function as exploratory research to test one of the many possible explanations: that the frequency with which these Twitch.tv linguistic features are used by specific Twitch.tv networks, correlates with the density of said networks. It will therefore approach Twitch.tv through the scope of social networking theory (Milroy & Milroy 1985), and will be centered on the following research question:

To what extent can the unique linguistic features exhibited by streaming communities on Twitch.tv be explained by the density of their network?

Social networking theory poses that the denser a network is, the more resistant it is to change. The expectation is therefore that dense networks on Twitch.tv will be influenced less by the features central to language use on Twitch.tv than loose networks, that is to say: the denser networks are expected to use these features less frequently than the looser networks.

In section 1.1, this thesis will attempt to place Twitch.tv within the field of research on CMC, and explain the basic concepts of Twitch.tv. In section 1.2, it will then outline four criteria generally used in the field of CMC research to define and explain a medium, and apply these to Twitch.tv in order to better understand the communication on this medium. Hereafter in section 1.3, it will place Twitch.tv in the field of research pertaining to community building in CMC, and discuss the applicability of social networking theory on this medium. Lastly it will report on the experiment that was conducted in order to answer the research question and test the hypothesis.

1. THEORETICAL FRAMEWORK

1.1 Computer Mediated Communication (CMC)

This section will outline the concepts pertaining to CMC relevant to this thesis, and will serve as a gateway to define video game live streaming as a medium of communication, and Twitch.tv as a platform. CMC refers to any human communication that takes place through, or is facilitated by, two or more electronic devices. A wide variety of media therefore fall under the umbrella of CMC, a few examples of which are e-mail, chat rooms, internet relay chat (IRC) and text messaging. CMC is recognized to combine a multitude of features that are associated with face-to-face interaction such as "immediacy and informality of style, transience of message, reduced planning and editing, rapid [or immediate] feedback" with properties of written language, such as "lack of visual and paralinguistic cues, physical absence of the addressee, written mode of delivery, etc" (Georgakopoulou 2011: 94). The increasing prevalence and importance of CMC has caused academic interest and research to thrive within a variety of social science disciplines, or as Georgakopoulou put it: "Within the broad linguistic areas of discourse studies and pragmatics alone, the range of topics and methodologies, as well as the pace of advances can only be rivaled by the rapid changes in the ever-growing medium itself" (2011: 93).

The combination of both of spoken-like and written-like features in CMC have sparked debate about the classification of CMC. Romiszowski and Mason (1996: 398) state that "CMC has been likened to speech, and to writing, and considered to be both and neither simultaneously." This 'interactive written discourse' or 'written speech' has been proposed in as early as 1991 by Kaye to be a different form altogether. Nowadays, there is a substantial body of work on both the spoken and written features of CMC that have largely outlined the discourse composition of various platforms (e.g., Reid 1991; Werry 1996; Du Bartell 1995; Maynor 1994; Yates 1992; Amiran & Unsworth 1991). All of these studies report a dynamic interaction of stylistic features in the various modes of CMC, which has caused a general consensus towards neither using a dichotomic distinction between spoken and written genres, nor a trichotomic spoken/written/electronic distinction, but rather treating it as "a continuum of discourse practices that not only cut across the three modes but also present several dimensions of variation which cannot form unitary and independent links with each of them" (Georgakopoulou, 2011: 96).

1.1.1. Video Game Live Streaming as CMC

Herring (2004: 29) stated that two technological trends affected multimedia CMC: increased bandwidth, allowing for incorporation of i.a. video and audio in communication platforms, and a growing tendency for availability through web browser interface, leading to easier accessibility for the general public. Even though this made audio and video streaming for entertainment purposes more popular, they were largely not used for communication. Herring concluded that "CMC has yet to embrace its full multimedia potential." (2004: 29)

Twelve years later it seems that CMC is in fact embracing its full multimedia potential through what is known as live streaming, video game live streaming being the most popular (henceforth simply referred to as streaming or broadcasting<sup>1</sup>). A stream can be centered on an event, such as a gaming tournament, as well as an individual streamer. Anyone with access to the internet can be a streamer, as there exist a plethora of free streaming platforms, and can stream content on almost any subject. The most notable development here is that viewers no longer solely go to streaming channels for the entertainment value of auditory and visual streaming, but also for the chat accompanying each channel, showing that streams are now in fact used for communication and that this is no longer secondary to another purpose (Hamilton et al. 2014). This has recently caused an increase of academic interest in the subject from a variety of social science disciplines such as linguistics and sociology (Hamilton et al. 2014; Hope 2014; Ramirez, Saucerman & Dietmeier 2014; Olejniczak 2015) which have shown Twitch.tv streams or channels to be participatory communities (Hamilton et al. 2014: 1315) with the capability of developing their own language varieties (Olejniczak 2015: 330). The next section will define Twitch.tv as a platform, after which this will be addressed in more detail.

1.1.1.1. Twitch.tv

Twitch.tv is a streaming platform specialized in gaming, allowing both casual players and eSport (electronic sport) organizations to broadcast in any language. As a result, it has over 1.7 million unique broadcasters and 16 million unique viewers per month (Quantcast 2015). Furthermore, the linguistic features of Twitch.tv also appear to diffuse into the general language of the gaming community outside of Twitch.tv (Olejniczak 2015: 333).

A Twitch.tv stream generally looks like this, even though broadcast layout may vary:

The broadcast, usually showing gameplay, is shown on the left, and the chat room where viewers of a specific stream can interact with the streamer and each other is situated on the right. Streamers often include a webcam feed of themselves embedded in the content "to facilitate richer engagement" (Hamilton 2014: 1316). Above the content box, the title, the game being played and the language of the broadcast can be specified by the streamer.

Twitch.tv streams make use of both one-way communication (e.g., instant messaging) and two-way communication (e.g., Skype) (Cherny 1999). That is to say, "whether or not a message is transmitted entirely as a single unit" (Herring 2008: 615). Therefore the chat makes use of one-way transmission, and the streamer of two-way transmission, as the addressee(s) (here: the viewers) are able to hear the message during its production. Two-way transmission is rare in CMC (Herring 2008) and may, among other things such as the webcam feed, be part of the reason viewers feel engaged with the stream.

1.2. Factors Influencing CMC

In addition to CMC differing from non-CMC, distinct media within the field of CMC show discrepancies pertaining to their way of communicating as well. The next section will outline four criteria generally used in the field of CMC research to define and explain a medium, and apply these to Twitch.tv in order to facilitate a better understanding of communication on this platform.

1.2.1. Synchronicity

Romiszowski & Mason (1996: 398) defined 'synchronicity' as referring to whether communication occurs in real-time or in delayed-time. They stated that in asynchronous forms of communication "there is a, potentially significant, time delay between sending a message and it being read". A chat room, for instance, is an example of a synchronous, real-time, form of CMC, where an online forum is an asynchronous, delayed-time, form of CMC. Outside of the domain of CMC, synchronous communication has its equivalent in for instance a face-to-face discussion or in a lecture, where asynchronous communication would be sending a letter. It is important to note that, particularly in CMC media, actual time is not necessarily significant to the notion of synchronicity, but rather whether interacting humans are required to be present in the same, albeit virtual, space at the time of communication. It is after all not impossible to react faster to an e-mail than to a comment in a chat room.

Synchronicity is shown to have an impact on multiple aspects of CMC. First of all, synchronous forms of CMC seem to be characterized, more so than asynchronous forms, by the aforementioned characteristics of face-to-face interaction, such as reduced planning and editing (Georgakopoulou 2011: 94), increased immediacy (Romiszowski & Mason 1996: 397; Georgakopoulou 2011: 94) and "reduction of linguistic complexity relative to asynchronous modes" (Herring 2008: 617). Moreover, synchronous forms of CMC have been shown to be more playful and jocular (Danet 1995: 2; Georgakopoulou 2011: 100). Lastly, synchronicity has been shown to impact processes of communication pertaining to information conveyance and convergence: asynchronous forms of CMC tend to be more suitable for the process of conveyance, where synchronous forms tend to be more suitable for the process of convergence (Dennis et al. 2008; Hassell & Limayem 2011; see also Media synchronicity theory (MST).

Twitch.tv is a synchronous medium, as participation is accomplished through joining a channel. Its chat is therefore characterized by the aforementioned features of synchronous CMC media. A frequent problem hindering interaction in CMC media, mostly on synchronous platforms, pertains to them being "interactionally incoherent" and "structurally fragmented" as a result of computer systems disregarding turn-taking (Herring 2008: 618). This problem pertains to what Werry in 1996 coined 'addressivity,' and causes multiple participators to converse on different subjects with different interlocutors at the same time. To overcome problems regarding addressivity, Twitch.tv chat includes a feature that allows the participants to directly address other participants by typing @[username], after which the addressee will get a notification that they are being addressed. By overcoming this issue of addressivity participants are still able to engage in meaningful interaction, where otherwise the huge number of participants would render any form of meaningful interaction virtually impossible.

1.2.2. Persistence, Transience and Message Uptime

'Transience (of message)' and the more commonly used term 'persistence' both refer to whether, and for how long, previous messages remain accessible to participants (Condon & Cech 1996). Low persistency - or a high degree of transience - can for example be found in instant messaging services (e.g., chat rooms), because the content is lost<sup>2</sup> when the conversation is over - in this case, when the dialog box has been closed. High persistency can be found in for instance e-mail and forums.

A nuance needs to be made here due to the ambiguity of persistence or transience of message when applied to Twitch.tv: because past broadcasts are saved, including a replay of the chat log, previous messages technically remain accessible to participants for up to 60 days, thusly the claim could be made that Twitch.tv is a medium with high persistency. However, this is highly irrelevant to the participants themselves, as a participant would have to remember the exact timestamp in a sometimes 10-hour long stream to access the message. Furthermore, it would be unlikely for the participant to continue his conversation with the interlocutor(s) of that time, as they would have to be in the same channel - and reading the chat - at the same time as the participant. A more relevant measure of persistency in Twitch.tv chat can then be achieved by looking at the 'message uptime'. This measures the amount of time a message is visible in the chat-window, and therefore decreases if messages are being sent at a more rapid pace. Seeing as the amount of messages varies per channel, depending on viewer count and chat-activity, the persistency of Twitch.tv chat also varies. Research into message uptime on Twitch.tv chat has shown that a message has screen time averaging approximately 100 seconds during a small broadcast, and 10 seconds during a large broadcast (Olejniczak 2015: 331). It can therefore be concluded that the persistency of Twitch.tv chat, although varying, is relatively low. Persistency in CMC has been shown to alter mostly sentence length, where low persistency favours shorter sentences as there is less time for interlocutors to read and interpret a message (Herring 2008; Georgakopoulou 2011). Lower message uptimes, and therefore lower persistency, are then expected to cause sentences on Twitch.tv to be shorter. This correlation is confirmed in Olejniczak's research (2015:331).

1.2.3. Anonymity

Research by Kim & Raja (1991) has shown that anonymous CMC media were subject to increased contentiousness and 'flaming' (overtly hostile message content targeting another user) when compared to media that require the user to provide for instance their name or email address. On the flipside, it has also been proposed that anonymity leads to a higher degree of self-disclosure because it encourages freedom of expression and adds to the comfort of the participant (Hawkes 1997; Jiang, Bazarova & Hancock 2011). Twitch.tv is an anonymous platform for the viewers, as the only input it requires is a username. However, users can update their profile including more personal information if they are so inclined. Furthermore, when attending a channel and participating in its chat more than once, chances are that in due time viewers will be recognized by the streamer and/or the viewers. It is debatable whether this actually reduces anonymity, but concern for loss of positive-face can occur when deciding whether or not to indulge in e.g., flaming in a channel the user frequents<sup>3</sup>. Increased contentiousness or flaming also relates to the problem of relative lack of governing codes of conduct in CMC (Mcquail 2005). On Twitch.tv, streamers generally create their own codes of conduct and post them on their channel (e.g., no swearing, only speak English, no harassment). If viewers then fail to adhere, the streamer has an option to ban the individual from chatting, or from their channel altogether. A streamer can also appoint moderators, usually people close to the streamer and/or regulars, who share this possibility of prohibiting viewers from engaging in further conversation, creating a sense of social control.

1.2.4. Active vs. Passive Participation

The distinction between active and passive participation (also known as lurking) refers to whether or not viewers are engaging with others (or on Twitch.tv, whether or not they are chatting). Lurking or "the passive consumption of electronic discussions" (Romiszowsky & Mason 1996: 399) has been the subject of ongoing debate and criticism of many CMC forms, where a discussion or chat being dominated only by a small part of the participants is seen as a bad thing. However, Romiszowsky & Mason (1996: 399) posited that in most face-to-face environments a select few dominate the discourse as well, with others making only occasional contributions, thus lurking most of the time. Moreover, they stated it would be impossible, also on CMC platforms, if all participants tried to actively engage at the same time. They therefore propose lurkers not to be seen as passive recipients but rather as being actively engaged in reading.

An issue pertaining to active vs passive participation that is exclusive to streaming lies with the viewer count (this indicates the number of participants during a broadcast) of a channel. The viewer count is solely based on whether the channel is opened in someone's web browser, and is unable to keep track of whether the possible participant is actually watching the stream or engaging in the chat. Moreover, it is possible to close the chat window or make the broadcast full screen, possibly increasing the number of passive (or in this case, inactive) participants. This problem will be addressed later on in section 2.1.

1.3. Community Building in CMC and Twitch.tv

"CMC, of course, is not just a tool; it is at once technology, medium, and engine of social relations. It not only structures social relations, it is the space within which the relations occur and the tool that individuals use to enter that space" (Jones 1995).

The notion of 'community' in the social sciences traditionally used to presuppose a shared space between participants. Together with a lack of visual and social context cues, early cultural theorists expressed pessimistic views towards relationships or communities on CMC media (Georgakopoulou 2011: 102). However it was specifically the CMC media that led to a redefinition of the notion of communities as a "product of shared relationships, norms, and values" (Watson 1997: 121). This was due in part to the CMC media showing users coming together and creating social structures exclusively out of words, even creating rules and sanctions against the violations of set rules in the process, together with hierarchical social structures (Herring 2008; Georgakopoulou 2011). In time, this caused CMC research to be based less on textual analyses and more on social interactionist approaches (Georgakopoulou 2011: 103).

1.3.1. Twitch.tv Communities

Hamilton et al. (2014: 1315) in their research on Twitch.tv found that viewers engage in live streaming for two reasons: "they are drawn to the unique content of a particular stream, and they like being interacted with and participating in that stream's community". They claimed Twitch.tv streams to be participatory communities, "characterized by openness [and] the encouragement of members to engage in shared activities", of which the primary activity is its sociability, defined as "the sheer pleasure of being together" (Hamilton et al. 2014: 1315). Furthermore, they concluded that streams function as virtual third places, a concept coined by ray Oldenburg in 1997 referring to informal public spaces where people engage in sociability to form and maintain communities, "in which informal communities emerge, socialize, and participate. Over time, stream communities form around shared identities drawn from streams' contents and participants' shared experiences" (Hamilton et al. 2014: 1315).

As a platform there are ample ways in which Twitch.tv lends itself to community-building that are generally not seen in CMC. There are, for instance, in-built mechanisms in the medium that allow for clear structuring of social hierarchy. Examples of this include moderators (upholding the codes of conduct, appointed by the streamer) and subscribers (audience members that pay a monthly fee to gain privileges such as a subscriber icon in front of their name). Moreover, the streamers try to actively have their audience participate in the stream by setting chat commands that influence the broadcast in one way or another (an example of this, taken from the stream of Aboekracity, is !bet, which allows the audience member bet on the outcome of the game being played), as well as encouraging them to revisit in the future, for instance by granting audience members virtual currency for every three minutes they spend watching the stream (which can be used to buy a variety of things, such as joining a game on stream). This active endeavor towards community building comes with interesting implications for research. First of all, it can cause larger and denser communities to arise when compared to previous forms of CMC due to factors such as in-built social hierarchy. Secondly, being a community-driven platform it is more likely for a standard usage of language unique to Twitch.ty to arise, as well as varieties hereof within specific networks.

1.3.2. Social networking theory and Twitch.tv

Georgakopoulou (2011: 103) predicted that next to social interactionist approaches to CMC, the concept of social network would be increasingly applied to CMC communities, "aimed at capturing the participants' social interactions and the relationship of those social patterns to the distribution of linguistic variables". Such an approach has been applied by Paolillo (1999) to IRC channels similar to Twitch.tv chat in their synchronicity, anonymity and persistence. His research is based on the sociolinguistic theory of social networks (also social networking theory or SNT) by Milroy and Milroy (1992) that accounts for language change on the basis of i.a. network tie strength. 'Strong ties' are characterized by more frequent interaction between the members of a network, and are typically associated in more than one social capacity (e.g., friends and colleagues), while 'weak ties' are characterized by more transient contact and are typically not anchored to any territory (Paolillo 1999). The theory claims that "members that are at the center of networks with predominantly strong ties tend to use more non-standard, vernacular variants" while members that are more periphery of the same network with predominantly weak ties "tend to have higher incidence of variants associated with the recognized standard variety" (Paolillo 1999: "Social Networks Language and IRC"). This pattern has caused Milroy and Milroy to speculate that strong ties propagate linguistic changes towards non-standard varieties, while weak ties propagate linguistic change towards the standard variety (Milroy & Milroy 1992). While Paolillo was unable to show a correlation between network tie strength and the frequency of non-standard linguistic variables within a single network, his research did provide some other relevant results. Firstly, his research showed that CMC media have highly structured social relationships. Secondly, peripheral members used variables that were widespread through IRC, which may hint towards a 'standard' usage particular to IRC, and if so, this would be naturally spread through weaker social network ties. A possible reason for why Paolillo's research could not predict language use on the basis of SNT, one that he attested to himself, is that his research was conducted within the boundaries of a single network, without taking into account a possible 'standard' variety to IRC that differed from standard use of English. Olejniczak has argued for the existence of such a standard variety of language Twitch.tv, and discerned three features central to its use (2015: 333). These features will be further discussed in the methodology.

So far it has been shown that Twitch.tv is a relatively new, yet popular, medium of communication, capable of developing highly structured social networks, with possible implications for a standard usage of language unique to the medium. This thesis, then, seeks to answer the following question: to what extent can the unique linguistic features exhibited by streaming communities on Twitch.tv be explained by the density of their network? Even though SNT has been applied to earlier CMC media without clear success, this thesis will conduct its study while taking into account standard linguistic features unique to the medium based on recent research, and will not limit itself to research within a single network.

2. METHODOLOGY

In order to facilitate an answer to the research question, four corpora have been compiled based on streams of various densities. Density in this research has been defined as how connected the members of a particular community are with each other. The density of a community was then subdivided into four categories: dense, relative dense, relatively loose and loose, with one streaming community being picked for each category. This research used an arbitrary excerpt of a streaming community's chat during a broadcast, rather than the entirety of messages during a broadcast, as this provided ample data to answer the research question in an exploratory manner. About 5 minutes of chat in the larger samples already provided over 1.000 messages, with streams being able to last for up to twelve hours. To retain all interaction, no messages were left out during the gathering of the data, and all data corresponds to the chat during a time span of about 5-15 minutes. The resulting quantitative data was then transcribed into four fully text-based corpora, this means that emoticons are denoted by the 'hotkey', the keystroke by which to insert an emoticon, rather than the emoticon itself. The corpora were then investigated in their frequency and use of Twitch.tv standard features as explained below. Section 2.1 will first outline which streaming channels were chosen for this research and how values of density were attributed to these networks, after which section 2.2 will discuss how the linguistic features of Twitch.tv have been analyzed.

2.1. Density and Networks

Attributing values of density to the various networks proved problematic due to the anonymity of the viewers, leaving no room to calculate density on the basis of actual connections between members of a community divided by the potential connections between members of that same community. Moreover, it is relatively safe to assume that in a community that does not share geographical space, the actual connections will generally be low. Furthermore, the medium provides only for uniplex relations between participants, that is to say, individuals only communicate within the boundaries of one social context (here, the streaming community). In order to overcome these problems, values of density were attributed based on three factors. The first factor used was the amount of strong ties in a network. Strong ties are central figures in a community. If the percentage of strong ties in a community is then relatively high compared to the percentage of weak ties, it can be assumed that a network is denser because of the larger interconnectedness within that community. A strong tie value was attributed to a participant if they were either a subscriber or a moderator (or both), because a participant does not become a moderator before having spent a significant amount of time in a community and having earned the streamers trust, nor does someone choose to subscribe to a channel unless they have spent a large amount of time in a community, or intent to do so in the future. In the corpus, subscribers and moderators are indicated with respectively % and @ before their usernames (see appendix II-V). The second factor which determined the density of a network in this research was size. Trudgill (2010) showed that small communities are more likely to be dense and large communities are more likely to be loose. The size of the community was calculated by looking at the average concurrent viewers over the course of a week. The last factor used to determine density was the percentage of viewers that were participating in the chat. A percentually more active chat shows a more devoted audience, signifying that the interaction is also what they came for.

Active viewer participation was calculated by dividing the number of people participating in the chat by the number of viewers, with the help of a Java based script<sup>4</sup>.

Based on these factors, four streaming channels were selected corresponding to various categories: dense, relatively dense, relatively loose and loose, with a corpus being compiled for each. These were all steamers that broadcast the same game (Hearthstone), in order to minimize the number of variables outside of network density (different games may come with different terminology or community norms altogether). Hearthstone is a turn-based card game developed by Blizzard, and is ranked 4th as the most watched game on Twitch.tv. It was chosen because of its turn-based gameplay, which generally causes streamers to interact with their audience more actively when compared to different games (such as League of Legends), increasing the density of the communities. Moreover, increased interaction by the streamer also causes more social control, decreasing the amount of contentious content. The streamers that were chosen for this research, including the statistics influencing density, can be seen below in figure 2.

2.2. Linguistic Features

The theoretical framework has shown the capabilities of Twitch.tv as a platform where communities with complex social structures emerge, as well as having discussed multiple factors impacting language use on CMC in general. All of these factors, taken together with shared experience within communities, shape linguistic behaviour, and as a result "experienced users may communicate systematically different from new users" (Weber 2011). This section aims to outline the three features that have been deemed standard to the language use of Twitch.tv by Olejniczak (2015), and discuss how these have been analyzed in the research.

2.2.1. The Repetition Principle

The repetition principle is unique to Twitch.tv and pertains to viewers frequently reproducing messages of other users at the same time, usually when something striking happens in the broadcast, resulting in sometimes hundreds of repeated messages with the same content.

These repeated messages take various forms such as a story or the expression of a feeling, and are generally accompanied by emoticons. The repetition principle has been divided into three categories for this research: one-word repetitions, sentence repetitions and story (multiple sentences) repetitions, as these are contextually different. One-word repetitions are usually a quick reaction to an event on stream, sentence repetitions can have a variety of contexts, and story repetitions are generally low in actual content, rather being created solely for attempted circulation (it is quite frequent for these stories to end on something along the lines of "please do not copy paste", which is meant as a false request not to reproduce them) (Olejniczak 2015: 332).

2.2.2. Twitch.tv Emoticons

Emoticons are commonplace in CMC, and are generally used to replace social cues normally conveyed by non-verbal interaction in face-to-face communication (e.g., =) as a smile or =P as sticking out your tongue) (Georgakopoulou 2011). On Twitch.tv emoticons function somewhat differently. Rather than just replacing audiovisual cues, they are often used instead of regular words. Olejniczak (2015: 332) hypothesized that this occurs due to Twitch.tv language users having to respond to rapidly changing visual stimulus, and emoticons facilitating "transparent and quick expression". Moreover, Park, Barash, Fink & Cha (2013: 474) proposed that "emoticons are evolving from a universal way of expressing faces in text to culturally-bounded emotional dialects". It is here important to note that Twitch.tv allows its streamers to upload custom emoticons that subscribers of their channel will be able to use anywhere on Twitch.tv. These custom emoticons usually resemble different facial expressions of a streamer, such as anger or surprise. As a result, there are over 1.000 emoticons, usually having a specific function or corresponding to a certain situation rather than replacing social cues. One of the most used emoticons on Twitch.tv is for instance 'Kappa', showing one of Twitch.tv's developers making a face, and is solely used for denoting sarcasm. Moreover, there are emoticons corresponding to various degrees of happiness, sadness and anger (e.g., 'Babyrage', showing an angry baby, is used when someone is angry about something deemed trivial). The usage of emoticons has been divided into four categories for this research: sentences containing one emoticon; sentences containing two or more emoticons; sentences consisting solely of one emoticon, and sentences consisting solely of multiple emoticons. This distinction has been made because of the varying contexts in which emoticons are used, such as strengthening or affecting the textual content, or to draw attention. A message containing one or more emoticon(s) refers to messages that are made up of both text and emoticon(s). A message consisting of one or more emoticon(s) refer to messages that are entirely constructed out of emoticon(s).

2.2.3. Neologisms

A neologism refers to a relatively new word, or to a new meaning being ascribed to an existing word (Levchenko 2010). Even though neologisms are certainly not exclusive to Twitch.tv, the community of Twitch.tv "uses a peculiar means of expression, which results in constant coining of new words, some of which survive the passage of time" (Olejniczak 2015: 333). Furthermore, CMC often contains non-standard features, only a small percentage of which are caused by lack of knowledge of the standard language forms. They are rather used "to economize on typing effort, mimic spoken language features, or express themselves creatively" (Herring 2008: 617). This causes CMC media to be more abundant in neologisms than non-CMC media. An example of such a neologism is 'Y' meaning 'why', being relatively clear in meaning due to the similar pronunciation, yet saving the sender some effort. CMC is also known to have unconventional orthography as a result of representing auditory information, such as laughter, as text (e.g., hahaha) (Herring 2008). Representing auditory information as text and the results of economizing on typing effort have not deemed neologisms for the purposes of this research as they are extremely commonplace nowadays on CMC in general, causing these two categories to be fringe cases of neologisms. Moreover, they will not provide any insight as to the use of neologisms as an effect of Twitch.tv's standard use of language. Syntactical neologisms such as morphological and phraseological neologisms, phonological neologisms and semantic neologisms were all included, but not accounted for in different categories. A categorization of different forms of neologisms proved irrelevant to the study. Multiple uses of the same neologisms were counted again.

3. RESULTS

The absolute numbers of individual features per corpora can be found in appendix I and the respective corpora in appendix II - V. Figure 3 (below) shows the absolute numbers of all streams in one table, as well as the results in percentages, which were calculated by dividing the number of individual features in a corpus by the total number of messages in that corpus.

Analyzing the respective corpora showed that they all had a relatively high number of messages containing Twitch.tv standard features, ranging from 67% in the dense category to 75% in the loose category, which does seem to confirm that the distribution of features standard to Twitch.tv can be explained for by network density. The high amount of Twitch.tv standard features throughout all networks seems to go hand-in-hand with the rather low textual quality of the messages. They were generally of simple grammatical structure and contained only a few words. Two examples of this are "trusilver will destroy heckler"

("trusilver" and "heckler" here both refer to names of in-game characters) and "how is the weed in malta?". Moreover, there was little overall interaction, rather making place for reactionary content in the form of an exclamation or emoticon (e.g., "wow", "Pogchamp" (emoticon denoting bliss), "lol" or "that's amazing"). In the larger streams, these messages containing or consisting of one emotion seem to have made way for messages containing multiple emoticons, often being neither high in content nor reactionary, but rather spam messages (e.g., දって益め、9 NOW WE RIOT දって益め、96). Total emoticon usage was higher for the looser streams when compared to the denser streams, respectively 70% to 57%, as was the use of neologisms, respectively 3% to 1.4%. Most neologisms pertained to general gaming terminology (e.g., 'rekt' meaning that someone badly lost a game), or to Hearthstone (e.g., 'coincede' a collocation of 'coin', a card in the game, and to concede, implying that the streamer should forfeit the match because they have the coin). Some other commonly used neologisms that seem to be rather confined to Twitch.tv include for instance morphological neologisms such as adding the affix "-ino" or "-erino" to seemingly random words (e.g., 'skipperino' instead of 'skip' (from 'to skip'), and semantic neologisms, such as turning a gamer's nickname into a verb. An example of this is the nickname of League of Legends professional 'xPeke', where 'to xPeke' is now used as 'to outsmart' due to his outstanding performance in an important match of League of Legends. Interestingly, these verbs created from nicknames also come in conjugated forms, such as 'xPeked' (you have been outsmarted). The total amount of repetitions was more numerous in the loose streams than in the dense streams (38% and 35% for the loose streams to 24% and 27% for the dense streams), of which the main difference was caused by the story repetitions. One-word repetitions were used slightly more by the dense networks than by the loose networks (10% and 14% for the dense streams to 7% and 8% for the loose streams), single sentence repetitions showed almost no difference, and the frequency of story repetitions in the loose streams rocketed (0% in the dense sample to 38% and 35% in respectively the relatively loose and the loose sample). These multiple sentence repetitions were largely the same spam content as noted earlier. Even though the general trend of the looser a network is, the more Twitch.tv standard variety features it uses seems evident, the difference between the dense and relatively dense corpora (corresponding to the streams of Neviilz and Thijs) was nihil. Usage of emoticons saw a 1% increase in the respective samples, frequency of repetitions increased by 3%, and the frequency of messages without Twitch.tv standard features only differed by 1%. The use of neologisms, however, saw a proportionally large increase in frequency of usage, from 1.4% to 2.5%.

4. DISCUSSION

Even though the corpora are relatively small in size, the data does seem to confirm the notion that network density can account for the distribution of Twitch.tv standard features. It shows a clear divide between the usage of Twitch.tv standard features with respect to the dense and the loose communities, with the loose networks using more Twitch.tv standard features than the dense networks. However, the difference between the dense and relatively dense networks was not so profound. This may point towards a breaking point where communities on Twitch.tv become too large to harbor interaction between viewers, possibly as a result of low message uptimes, causing viewers to engage in the spamming of messages without real content and trying to draw attention by using more emoticons. This seems to be strengthened by the increased frequency of multiple sentence repetitions and use of multiple emoticons towards the looser networks. The overall low textual quality of the messages and little interaction between participants throughout all streams may point towards either all of the networks being too large to be truly dense communities, or towards Twitch.tv being a medium that has its focus more on reactionary and facetious content than is assumed. It is interesting that the increase in emoticons per sentence goes together with a decrease in textual content, showing that perhaps single emoticons are indeed used to strengthen the textual content of the message, and multiple emoticons per sentence being of a more facetious nature, not meant for interaction but for the enjoyment of the sender (to draw either attention or to purposefully hinder interaction). Moreover, there seems to be a certain type of meta-humour or recurring inside jokes throughout the whole of Twitch.tv, as some of the repeated messages clearly meant to be playful were found throughout multiple streams (such as, "this streamer is look very nerd"). The neologisms that were used, aside from frequency, did not show much difference, and are largely used in the gamer community outside of Twitch.tv as well (even though these terms may stem from Twitch.tv). The aforementioned morphological neologisms (adding '-ino' or '-erino) may be a form of creative expression, and turning nicknames into verbs may pertain to a more advanced way of remembering celebrities for their accomplishments or striking moments. Outside of the domain of Twitch.tv, this is not unheard of, as indicated by the existence of phrases such as "he went Mike Tyson" (going crazy) or "he pulled a Cosby" (according to the urban dictionary: slipping drugs into a woman's drink). On Twitch.tv phrases such as these may emerge in a similar way, and in time, possibly due to the high usage of these phrases together with the tendencies to economize on typing efforts and creative expression, they can then turn into full-fledged verbs including conjugations ("he pulled an xPeke" into "I just xPeked"). Interestingly, the keystrokes used as input for an emoticon on Twitch.tv are also used outside of the medium, suggesting that they may become neologisms in their written form (e.g., Feelsgoodman), or that the sender is presupposing a shared knowledge of Twitch.tv terminology when speaking to another gamer. The substitution of words for emoticons, as indicated by sentences consisting entirely of emoticons, may pose to be an interesting topic of further research. The current state of Twitch.tv emoticons still only allows for reactionary or rather basic content on the basis of emoticons (e.g., 'im happy'), but with new emoticons being added daily, and their meaning getting ever more specified (e.g., 'I think you're overreacting'), it is possible that these could develop into their own method of communication.

Further research on the topic may want to look at smaller networks with more qualitative corpora. All of the communities used in this thesis still had a proportionally large amount of weak links. This caused the amount of messages that were not reactionary, also in the dense communities, to be lower than expected. Networks with for instance less than 300 viewers are bound to have a relatively high percentage of strong ties and re-visiting audience members actively participating in chat, probably increasing the amount messages meant for interaction. Qualitative corpora may also want to incorporate the spoken messages of the streamer, to gain better insight into what exactly participants are reacting to, and when this occurs. Moreover, further research may also want to improve on the size of the corpora, for instance by including all of the messages within multiple broadcasts of the same streamer. Aside from more data leading to increased validity of findings, the influence of weak links should become more clear this way, as they are not expected to re-visit on a regular basis. This also allows for the possibility to study meta-humour and neologisms of Twitch.tv versus meta-humour and neologisms specific to a channel, perhaps shedding light on how and where these emerge.

5. CONCLUSION

This study has placed Twitch.tv within the fields of research on CMC, shown the capabilities of Twitch.tv as a platform where communities with advanced social structures can occur, argued for a standard usage of language particular to Twitch.tv, and conducted an experiment applying social networking theory on this medium in order to test whether the distribution of linguistic features deemed standard to this platform can be accounted for by the density of its networks. The social networking theory poses that the denser a network is, the more resistant it is to change. We therefore expected that the denser networks in this study would be less influenced by the linguistic features standard to the language use of Twitch.tv. Through compiling, analyzing and comparing four corpora of various densities, which were based on their strong tie participation, the approximate size of the network, and the percentual active chat participation, it showed some evidence for this claim. In total, the dense networks had a higher percentage of messages not containing any linguistic features standard to Twitch.tv than the loose networks, ranging from 34% to 25%. Especially the usage of emoticons and repetitions was significantly lower in the denser networks. Even though its sample sizes were relatively small, the overall textual quality of the corpora was low, and further research with smaller networks and larger sample sizes will be required as proof, it did provide some evidence pertaining to the hypothesis, and a satisfactory answer to the research question. There was a clear connection between the frequency of linguistic features standard to Twitch.tv and the density of a network, confirming the notion that network density can indeed account for the distribution of linguistic features on Twitch.tv.
